Welcome back!

As the closures that began on March 12, 2020 stretched on and on for over a year I began to wonder if I would ever have the opportunity to utter these two simple words again: Welcome back.

The past year presented overwhelming challenges and losses to individuals, families, communities, and industries including the Arts. The entire world began to realize just how connected we all are. Einstein claimed that every living thing down to the smallest organism had an impact on us all. Never was that theory more evident than the past fifteen months.

We have all been inundated with daily events around the world and especially the United States that boggled the mind and went far beyond what any novelist or scriptwriter could have dreamed of in their wildest imaginations. The United States alone has lost more than 600,000 lives due to COVID19. Tales of incredible courage and sacrifice made by healthcare staff and emergency responders as well as individual acts of kindness gave us hope in the darkness.

The past fifteen months also presented opportunities for change and improvement in daily operations. The Weinberg Center for the Arts has upgraded the HVAC systems that eliminates viral particles in the air and installed automatic door openers and touchless bathroom dispensers to reduce the number of surfaces that are touched. We now are employing touchless ticket scanners as well as encouraging people to download tickets directly onto their phones. CDC safety guidelines have been followed to make the performance experience as safe as possible.

However, the most important opportunity that is now open to us is the experience of a live event. While artists have been very imaginative in the past year in providing high quality virtual events Washington Post Theater Critic Peter Marks said it best when he said that he misses the “crackle” of a live performance. Artists and patrons alike have missed the experience that only a live performance can provide. We at the Weinberg Center for the Arts are planning to present an entire season of experiences as the following pages show.

As for me, I look forward to walking onstage once again before a show and say those two simple words: “Welcome Back”

– John Healey, Executive Theater Manager
